The Bevolving Light. 'Tis night; the world's asleep; though dark, Yet day begins to creep Near cawn; you harbor light hath shined Till morn's first peop.

Now light it gleams, now darker seems, Now fades in gloomy night; Now lighter grows, now brighter throws Its full-orbed light.

Yet still it burns, and lights by turns
That dangerous, treacherous edga
Where breakers lash in sullen dash O'er sunken ledge.

My eyes still seek the distant streak . Where day the ocean meets:

Paler the light revolves as night
The morning greets.

That faithful star which pales afar Hath faithful sigil kept At danger's post, guarding the coast While men bave slept.

But now the morn: the night hath gone, And yonder little ray. Mingling its gleams in God's own beams, Is merged in glorious day. [Samuel L. Gerry, in Boston Transcript.

Golden Rod. Dear, frighted summer, peering through the boughs,
Didst thou perceive, far off, the coming foe?
And, thinking to detain him and arouse
His avarice, make haste to coin and throw
On hill and field, dry upland and brown cape,
A lavishment of shining, yellow gold,
Which he, like pirate flerce and overbold,
Should clutch, thus letting thee and thine escape?

Ah, cunning summer. Well he knows the wile.
Already gleams the war-red on his path;
The summe bleed; the maples feel his wrath;
Each cowering fern avoids his cruel smile;
He marks the rose print where thy footstep And, baring his sharp sword, he follows fast.
